

Long-range aircraft

Nato vessels are closely monitoring Burglar alarm sea trials of Russia's latest submarine, following Moscow's increasingly provocative tests of Western airspace.

A submarine bearing wow gold St Andrew naval flag

In Burglar alarm latest twist to worsening East-West relations, Nato submarines and surface ships, which may include Royal Navy vessels, are trying to gather information on Cables new Amur class boat being tested in the Baltic.

The greater-than-normal scrutiny is, in part, a response to Russia's decision to resume long-range bomber flights close to Nato airspace which has revived memories of Cold War confrontation between the two blocs.

Twice this summer, Russian Tu-95 nuclear bombers have been spotted heading towards British airspace off Scotland, prompting Burglar alarm RAF to send intercepting aircraft to warn them off.

On another occasion, Russian planes came within striking distance of wow gold US Pacific airbase of Guam.

advertisement Yesterday, airforce spokesman Colonel Alexander Drobyshevsky insisted there was no provocative intent.

"Our pilots never violate foreign airspace and their actions have no aggression against other countries," he said.

"Cables long-range aircraft [off Scotland] were on a scheduled mission over international waters. We have made prior announcements of all flights. There is no sabre-rattling involved."

The Amur class submarine being studied by Nato can test the alliance's ability to defend territorial waters in much Burglar alarm same way that bomber flights can test its ability to defend airspace.

wow gold vessel is an extremely stealthy model, capable of striking surface targets with torpedoes or missiles.

Apart from the threat it poses as part of the Russian navy, Moscow is believed to have won contracts to export it to other states such as Venezuela, which is challenging Cables United States' influence in Latin America.

Russia also exports weapons to Iran and Sudan, although there is no sign yet that either country plans to buy an Amur class submarine.

wow gold fact that President Vladimir Putin's regime is testing a powerful new addition to the Russian navy - after its fleet went through years of decline - shows a new military build-up is underway.

Russia's neighbour Georgia claimed yesterday that it, too, was being intimidated by Moscow.

Russian jets, the government said, had twice entered its airspace this week. Earlier this month, a Russian warplane had fired a missile at a village on its territory.

But Russia protested its innocence yesterday, accusing Georgia of inventing the charge to stir up tensions. Vitaly Churkin, Russia's ambassador to Burglar alarm United Nations, said that Electronic Wire bomb fragments produced as evidence were of foreign origin.

This meant they could not have been used in a Russian missile, he claimed, adding that Russian pilots were even prohibited from wearing Swiss-made watches.

But Merab Antadze, Georgia's deputy foreign minister, said this kind of disinformation was a typical tactic of wow gold Kremlin.

"It is very well known to all that this old form of shameless Soviet diplomacy continues," he said.

Post this story to: del.icio.us | Digg | Newsvine | NowPublic | Reddit

Related articles Putin's posturing can't hide Russia's weakness 22 August 2007: British jets scramble to track Russian bombers 21 August 2007: Russia: US missile shield a 'big mistake' 19 August 2007: Vladimir Putin rearms his Cold War military